

CHESS IN THE BLOCK

Survival, silence, pressure, love, loss, and learning how to move without losing yourself.

Sabino Pereira

Chess in the Block

Copyright (c) 2026 Sabino Pereira. All rights reserved.

No part of this book may be reproduced without permission from the author, except for brief quotations used for review or commentary.

First English-language edition.

Table of Contents

Opening - The Board

The Pawn - One Step at a Time

Promotion - Becoming More Than They Expected

The Knight - Moving Different

The Bishop - Faith, Silence, and Judgment

The Rook - The Ones Who Hold the Line

The Queen - The Invisible Power

The King - The Weight of Command

Checkmate - The End of the Illusion

Endgame - Another Board

Opening - The Board

Some people are born into the game protected.

They are born in quiet homes. With food in the fridge. With adults who have time to ask how they feel. With room to make mistakes. Room to dream. Room to figure out who they are before the world starts charging them for it.

Others are not.

Others begin the match already backed against a wall, trying to survive before they even understand the rules.

On the block where I grew up, nobody talked about chess.

We talked about rent.

About who got locked up.

About whose mother was working another double.

About which street you did not cross after dark.

About bills on the kitchen table and dreams that had to wait because somebody needed groceries before they needed hope.

But looking back, I can see it now.

Everybody was moving like a piece.

The pawns woke up first.

They caught the early bus, cleaned buildings they would never own, carried boxes in warehouses with no windows, cooked food for people who never learned their names, and came home too tired to explain why silence was sometimes the only rest they had left.

The knights moved differently.

They never had a straight road, so they learned the side streets.
Some became creative. Some became dangerous. Some were only trying to survive a world that kept closing doors in their face and then blamed them for climbing through windows.

The rooks stood tall: fathers, older brothers, mothers who had no time to fall apart, people who made pride look like strength because nobody had ever given them permission to be tired.

The queens moved in every direction: mothers, grandmothers, aunties, neighbors.
Women who knew who had eaten, who was sick, who needed a ride, who was lying when they said they were fine. Women who could turn a little into enough and enough into something that almost looked like a miracle.

And then there were the kings.

Everybody thinks the king is in charge.

But on a chessboard, the king is also the piece most afraid of losing everything.

It took me years to understand that.

Years to understand that some men do not control the room because they are powerful. They control it because they are scared. Scared to fail.
Scared to be small. Scared that if they stop acting hard, the whole world will see the boy inside them who never felt safe.

The board changes from city to city.

The game does not.

Some people play for money.

Some play for respect.

Some play because survival was the first rule they ever learned.

Where I came from, childhood did not always look like childhood.

Some kids learned the sound of police sirens before they learned the sound of peace. Some learned how to read a room before they learned how to read a book.

Some learned not to ask for too much because the adults around them were already carrying more than they could say.

There were children who knew which bills were late.

Children who knew when the fridge was too empty.

Children who could tell by the way a key turned in the door whether the night would be calm or heavy.

Nobody called that intelligence.

But it was.

It was a kind of intelligence that does not show up on a report card.
The kind that teaches you when to speak, when to disappear, when to make a joke, when to lower your voice, when to leave the room, and when to stay close because someone you love is about to break.

The world likes to talk about strategy as if it belongs to people in suits, in boardrooms, moving money around on glass tables.

But I saw strategy in kitchens.

I saw it in mothers stretching one meal across three plates.

I saw it in men choosing silence because they did not trust their own anger.

I saw it in older sisters becoming second mothers before they were old enough to understand what they had lost.

I saw it in boys pretending not to care because caring made them look weak.

I saw it in people laughing loudly outside and crying quietly in bathrooms.

I saw it in survival.

Not the kind that gets applause.

The kind that gets up again the next morning.

Life taught me chess before I knew the names of the pieces.

It taught me that some people sacrifice everything and still never get called heroes. That silence can be more dangerous than shouting. That love can protect you, but it can also teach you to disappear. And that some defeats begin long before checkmate.

For a long time, I thought command meant control.

Control the room.

Control your face.

Control your pain.

Control what people know about you.

Control the story before somebody uses it against you.

The block teaches that to a lot of people. Not because the block is evil, but because people under pressure learn to protect themselves in ways that can later become prisons.

You learn not to cry.

Then one day you cannot.

You learn not to need anybody.

Then one day love feels like danger.

You learn to keep moving.

Then one day rest feels like guilt.

You learn to be strong.

Then one day nobody knows how to hold you because you have spent your whole life convincing them you cannot fall.

This book is about that.

Not chess as a game.

Chess as a language.

A way to look at people and understand that nobody is just one thing.

A pawn can carry a family.

A knight can look lost and still be finding a way.

A bishop can see pain from an angle nobody else notices.

A rook can stand so long it forgets it was allowed to lean.

A queen can save everyone and still be unseen.

A king can look powerful and still be afraid.

And checkmate is not always the end of a life.

Sometimes it is the end of a lie.

The first lesson may be this:

before you judge a move, learn the board.

Because people move from what they have lived.

From hunger.

From grief.

From pride.

From old shame.

From love they never received.

From love they do not know how to give.

From rooms where nobody apologized.

From streets where softness had to hide.

From homes where everybody survived, but nobody knew how to heal.

I am still learning how to play.

But I know this now:

winning is not becoming untouchable.

Winning is not making everybody fear your next move.

Winning is not standing above people who once looked down on you.

Maybe winning is quieter than that: being able to sit with your own story without running from it, protecting your heart without turning it into a weapon, and moving through the world without abandoning the person inside you who still remembers what it cost to survive.

This book is not about beating everybody.

It is about not losing yourself.

The Pawn - One Step at a Time

The pawn is always the first to move.

Maybe that is why it reminds me of people who grew up without many choices.

People who had to wake up early before the city opened its eyes.
People who left home already tired from yesterday. People who did not have time to talk about dreams because there were bills on the table, food to find, children watching, and no room for beautiful excuses.

In chess, the pawn looks small.

In life, too.

But it is almost always the pawn that carries the beginning of the war.

I saw many pawns on my block.

Men with worn-out hands.

Women with tired souls.

Kids who learned to lower their heads before they learned to raise their voices.

Nobody called them strategic.

They called them workers.

They called them good people.

They called them strong.

But surviving every day without losing all tenderness is also strategy.

And maybe it is one of the hardest strategies there is.

The pawn moves little.

One step at a time.

No drama.

No applause.

No one stopping to say, "That is courage too."

But some lives are saved exactly like that: slowly, carefully, with fear in the body and faith in tomorrow, even when tomorrow looks almost the same as today.

For a long time, I thought being a pawn meant being weak.

I thought power was being loud.

Having money.

Having people know your name when you walked into a room.

Having enough control that nobody could embarrass you, leave you, fire you, ignore you, or make you feel small.

Then I grew up.

And I began to notice the people who held the world together without ever being invited to the table where the world was discussed.

My mother was a pawn many times.

Not because she was small.

Because she kept moving when nobody opened a path.

I watched her count money like she was calculating moves. I watched her hide tiredness so we would not be afraid. I watched her lose things she wanted so we could have things we needed.

She never called it sacrifice.

She called it life.

That may be what hurts most about pawns.

They get used to suffering quietly.

Used to being needed but not seen.

Used to being strong but not cared for.

Used to giving everything even when almost nothing is left.

On the block, a pawn could be the man sweeping floors in an office tower before the people with offices arrived.

It could be the woman in scrubs waiting for the bus in the dark, her feet already hurting before the shift even started.

It could be the kid translating letters for his parents because the system spoke a language the house did not.

It could be the older brother who stopped being a child the first time he saw his mother cry over money.

It could be the grandmother who knew how to make a meal out of what other people would have called nothing.

It could be anyone who learned that life does not always ask if you are ready.

Sometimes it just hands you weight.

And you carry it.

Not because you are built for it.

Because someone has to.

The pawn teaches a hard lesson.

Small does not mean simple.

Quiet does not mean empty.

Limited does not mean useless.

There are people whose whole life has been one square at a time. No shortcuts.

No rescue. No applause. Just the next right move with a tired body and a heart that has learned not to expect too much.

But the pawn has a secret.

If it crosses the board, it can become something else.

That idea stayed with me.

Because where I came from, transformation was not presented as something beautiful. It was treated like suspicion.

If you tried to change, people asked who you thought you were.

If you wanted more, they said you were forgetting where you came from.

If you spoke differently, dressed differently, dreamed differently, moved differently, someone would remind you of the old version of yourself as if your past was a leash.

That is another kind of board.

The one outside you is hard.

The one inside your own people can be harder.

Because sometimes the people who love you also know you through your old pain.

They know how you survived, but they do not always know how to watch you grow.

So a pawn learns to move twice.

First through the world.

Then through the expectations of everyone who only knew them when they were small.

I have respect for pawns now.

Not romantic respect.

Real respect.

The kind that comes from understanding how much discipline it takes to continue when nobody thinks your movement matters.

Every city is full of pawns.

They are opening stores before sunrise.

They are closing restaurants after midnight.

They are cleaning schools their own children are told to be grateful to attend.

They are sending money back home.

They are raising children alone.

They are swallowing pride in front of managers half their age.

They are carrying families, histories, debts, illnesses, secrets, and still finding a way to say, "I'm fine," because sometimes saying the truth would make the room heavier than anybody can afford.

The pawn does not need pity. The pawn needs recognition.

Because pity looks down.

Recognition looks properly.

And when you look properly, you see that some of the strongest people in the world have spent their lives taking one step at a time.

Not because they had no imagination.

Because the board was crowded.

Because every move cost something.

Because one wrong step could affect more than just them.

People with easier lives often miss that.

They talk about freedom as if everybody begins with the same number of squares.

They say, "Just choose better."

"Just work harder."

"Just leave."

"Just start over."

But there is no "just" when your life is tied to rent, children, papers, debt, medicine, family, shame, fear, and the kind of love that makes walking away feel like betrayal.

Some people are not slow because they lack ambition.

They are slow because they are carrying everybody.

And still, somehow, they move.

That is why I do not laugh at small steps anymore.

Small steps kept people alive.

Small steps kept lights on.

Small steps put food on tables.

Small steps got children through school.

Small steps carried families across years nobody clapped for.

The pawn is not the weakest piece.

The pawn is the piece that proves a life can begin with almost nothing and still move toward change.

One square.

Then another.

Then another.

Until one day, the board has to admit what it tried to ignore:
the small piece was never small inside.

Promotion - Becoming More Than They Expected

In chess, promotion is simple.

A pawn reaches the other side of the board and becomes something more powerful.

In life, it is not that clean.

Nobody plays music when you change.

Nobody announces that you have crossed something.

Most of the time, you become different quietly.

You stop answering the phone for people who only call to drain you.

You stop laughing at jokes that are really insults with rhythm.

You stop confusing chaos with loyalty.

You stop calling pain normal just because it was familiar.

And at first, people do not celebrate.

They question it.

They miss the version of you that needed less.

They trusted the version of you that accepted everything.

They understood the version of you that stayed in the same square.

Growth can make people uncomfortable because it forces them to update the story they had about you.

And some people would rather keep you small than admit they never really saw you.

Promotion is not becoming better than where you came from.

That is important.

Because there is a kind of success that turns cruel when it starts pretending it was self-made.

Nobody survives alone.

Even the person who says they did it by themselves was carried by something:

a prayer, a memory, a teacher, a neighbor, a mother, a song, a warning, a dead friend's name, a stranger's kindness, a pain they refused to repeat.

Promotion is not betrayal.

It is proof.

Proof that the first square was not the whole story.

Proof that where you begin can shape you without owning you.

Proof that a person can honor the block without being trapped by it.

But becoming more comes with grief.

Nobody tells you that.

They tell you to rise.

They tell you to win.

They tell you to make it out.

But they do not tell you how strange it feels to outgrow the version of yourself that protected you.

The old you was not stupid.

The old you survived.

The old you learned rules you needed at the time.

Keep your face still.

Do not show fear.

Do not ask for too much.

Do not trust too fast.

Do not let people know where it hurts.

Those rules may have kept you alive.

But a rule that saves you in one season can suffocate you in another.

That is the painful part.

You can be grateful for your armor and still take it off.

You can love where you came from and still need a different future.

You can respect survival and still want peace.

For some people, promotion is money.

For others, it is education.

For others, it is leaving.

For others, it is staying and becoming softer than the place allowed them to be.

That last one might be the hardest.

Because the world understands visible success.

New job.

New car.

New city.

New house.

New name on a door.

But it does not always understand the quiet promotions.

The first apology.

The first therapy session.

The first honest conversation with your father.

The first time you tell your child, "I was wrong."

The first time you rest without feeling useless.

The first time you let someone love you without testing how long they can survive your fear.

Those are promotions too.

Maybe the deepest one is becoming someone your younger self would feel safe with.

Not impressed by.

Safe with.

Because what is the point of reaching the other side of the board if you become the same kind of danger you once had to escape?

I have seen people rise and harden.

I understand why.

Sometimes success feels like revenge.

You want the people who ignored you to see you.

You want the people who doubted you to hear your name.

You want the world to know it was wrong.

There is fire in that.

Fire can move you.

But fire cannot raise you.

At some point, revenge becomes too small a house for the person you are becoming.

Promotion asks a better question:

Now that you have more power, what will you protect?

Your ego?

Your image?

Your old wounds?

Or the life you are finally free enough to build?

The pawn becomes powerful when it reaches the end.

But a person becomes mature when they understand that power is not the same as healing.

You can have more money and still be afraid.

You can have more respect and still feel unseen.

You can have more choices and still keep choosing what hurts because pain was your first language.

So promotion is not only about moving up.

It is about moving deeper.

Into honesty.

Into responsibility.

Into the kind of freedom that does not need to humiliate anyone to prove it is real.

When a pawn becomes something else, the board changes.

When a person becomes someone else, the family changes.

The friendships change.

The room changes.

The old jokes do not land the same way.

The old fears lose some of their authority.

The old silence starts to feel expensive.

And slowly, the person realizes:

I was not born only to survive the board.

I was born to understand it.

And then, maybe, to move differently.

The Knight - Moving Different

The knight is strange.

It does not move like the others.

It does not go straight like the rook.

It does not slide across the board like the bishop.

It does not move with the freedom of the queen or the caution of the king.

The knight moves in a shape that looks wrong until you understand it.

Two squares one way.

One square another way.

A turn inside the movement.

A bend.

An interruption.

A way around what blocks everybody else.

That may be why I understood the knight before I respected it.

Where I came from, very few people had straight roads.

Some people were born with a clean line in front of them: school, college, job, house, retirement, peace. Maybe not easy, but at least visible. A path somebody had already explained to them.

For others, the road was broken before they stepped on it.

The school was underfunded.

The house was loud.

The money was short.

The neighborhood was watched but not protected.

The adults were tired.

The future felt like something that belonged to other ZIP codes.

So people learned to move like knights.

Not straight.

Around.

Through.

Between.

Some learned how to talk their way out of danger.

Some learned how to make money from almost nothing.

Some learned how to read faces, doors, streets, weather, silence.

Some learned how to become funny because sadness was too heavy to carry in public.

Some learned how to become hard because softness had been used against them too many times.

People who grow up with blocked paths often become creative before anybody calls them creative.

They improvise.

They adjust.

They make a plan out of leftovers.

They turn a corner and call it strategy because the straight road was never offered.

But the knight also carries danger.

Because when you spend your whole life moving around things, you can forget how to move toward anything.

You get good at escape.

Good at excuses.

Good at disappearing before someone can leave you.

Good at making everything a joke.

Good at changing the subject when the truth gets close.

Good at surviving every room without belonging in any of them.

That is the shadow of the knight.

The same movement that saves you can keep you from staying anywhere long enough to be loved properly.

I saw many knights on the block.

Boys who were smarter than school knew how to measure.

Girls who could organize a whole house before they were old enough to drive.

Men who could fix anything except the silence between them and their children.

Women who could find a way through every crisis but did not know how to rest when the crisis was over.

Some people called them difficult.

I think many of them were displaced.

There is a difference.

Difficult means the person is the problem.

Displaced means the person learned to move in a world that never made proper room for them.

That does not excuse everything.

Pain explains.

It does not erase responsibility.

A knight can be brilliant and still hurt people.

A knight can find exits and still avoid accountability.

A knight can survive the board and still leave damage behind.

That is the part we have to tell the truth about.

Because not every alternative path is wisdom.

Sometimes it is fear wearing the clothes of independence.

Sometimes it is pride calling itself freedom.

Sometimes it is trauma calling itself personality.

I know this because I have moved like that too.

I have taken the long way around conversations I should have had directly.

I have called distance peace when really it was protection.

I have acted calm because I did not want anyone to know how much something affected me.

I have made silence look mature when it was only fear with better posture.

The knight in me knew how to avoid.

But avoiding is not the same as healing.

That is a lesson many of us learn late.

We think because we found a way out, we are free.

But sometimes we only found a more intelligent prison.

A better mask.

A cleaner excuse.

A prettier version of running.

The knight teaches us that movement is not always progress.

You can move a lot and still be circling the same wound.

You can change cities and still carry the same fear into every room.

You can meet new people and still punish them for what old people did.

You can start over and still bring the old board with you.

So the question is not only:

How do I get around what blocks me?

The deeper question is:

Where am I actually trying to go?

Without that, the knight becomes restless.

Always moving.

Always clever.

Always unavailable.

Always one step away from being truly known.

On the block, cleverness was often rewarded.

If you could talk fast, move fast, think fast, people respected you.

If you could find a shortcut, people noticed.

If you could get out of trouble, people laughed and said you were sharp.

But nobody asked what all that speed was hiding.

Nobody asked why stillness felt dangerous.

Nobody asked why some people could handle pressure but not affection.

Nobody asked why a compliment made them uncomfortable, why safety bored them, why peace made them suspicious.

When chaos raises you, calm can feel like a trap.

That sentence took me years to understand.

Some people do not sabotage good things because they are ungrateful.

They sabotage them because good things require a kind of trust they were never taught.

Peace asks you to stop scanning the room.

Love asks you to be seen without performing.

Stability asks you to believe something can stay.

For someone raised around sudden changes, that can feel almost impossible.

So they move like knights.

Sideways.

Around.

Away.

Close enough to be missed.

Far enough not to be held.

But there is beauty in the knight too.

A healed knight is powerful.

A healed knight can see routes others cannot see.

Can help people escape places that once trapped them.

Can turn pain into imagination.

Can turn survival into art.

Can teach the world that not every life has to move in a straight line to arrive somewhere meaningful.

The knight reminds me of everyone who had to invent a path because no one built one for them.

The first in the family to graduate.

The first to leave the neighborhood.

The first to stay sober.

The first to apologize.

The first to say, "This ends with me."

The first to love without repeating what they survived.

Those are knight moves too.

Unexpected.

Awkward at first.

Hard to explain to people who only understand straight lines.

But real.

And sometimes, necessary.

Not every life moves forward in a clean direction.

Some lives move in turns.

In pauses.

In almoses.

In detours that later become testimony.

In mistakes that become maps.

In roads that look wrong until you understand what they had to avoid.

So I try to judge less quickly now.

When I see someone moving strangely through life, I ask myself:

What blocked their straight road?

What did they have to learn too early?

What are they avoiding?

What are they protecting?

And what would it take for them to stop running without feeling like they are standing in danger?

The knight does not teach us to glorify chaos.

It teaches us to respect adaptation.

It teaches us that some people are not lost because they took another route.

Some people are alive because they did.

But it also asks us to grow past survival.

Because one day, if we are lucky, the board changes.

The thing that once blocked us is no longer there.

The door opens.

The room becomes safe.

The person in front of us is not the person who hurt us.

And in that moment, the old movement may no longer be needed.

That is when the knight must learn the hardest thing:

not how to escape,

but how to arrive.

The Bishop - Faith, Silence, and Judgment

The bishop moves diagonally.

It does not go straight at what it wants.

It sees the board from an angle.

That matters.

Because some truths cannot be seen head-on.

Some things only reveal themselves from the side. In what people avoid saying.

In the pause before an answer. In the way a mother wipes the counter when she is trying not to cry. In the way a father gets quiet when the conversation gets too close to his shame.

The bishop reminds me of people who learned to read what was hidden.

Not because they wanted to.

Because they had to.

On the block, not everything was spoken.

Some pain lived in the walls.

Some secrets sat at the dinner table and ate with the family.

Some names were not mentioned.

Some questions were answered with, "Leave it alone."

Some stories had missing pieces everybody could feel but nobody was allowed to touch.

That is how silence becomes a language.

Children learn it quickly.

They learn which subjects change the room.

They learn which adults are safe in the morning but not at night.

They learn when money is bad, when love is tired, when someone is lying, when the house is holding its breath.

Nobody teaches them.

They just learn.

They become little bishops, reading the diagonal lines of a life too complicated for straight answers.

Faith was part of that too.

In many homes, God was everywhere.

On the wall.

In the prayers before sleep.

In the songs coming from an old radio on Sunday morning.

In the grandmother who said, "God is watching," with the same voice she used to say, "Eat before it gets cold."

Faith gave people strength.

I believe that.

I saw people survive things that would have broken them if they did not believe there was something bigger than the room they were trapped in.

Faith helped mothers keep going.

Helped fathers swallow fear.

Helped people bury loved ones and still cook for the living.

Helped families hold themselves together when money, health, and luck all seemed to leave at the same time.

But faith can also be misused.

We have to be honest about that.

Sometimes people used God to avoid apologies.

Used prayer to silence pain.

Used forgiveness to rush wounds that had not even been cleaned.

Used religion to protect the person who caused harm instead of the person who was harmed.

I heard people say, "Just pray about it," when what they meant was,
"Do not make this uncomfortable."

I heard, "Honor your family," when what they meant was, "Do not tell the truth."

I heard, "Let it go," when nobody had ever held the person accountable.

That kind of faith does not heal.

It hides.

And hidden pain does not disappear.
It moves into the body.
Into the voice.
Into the way people love.
Into the way they raise children.
Into the way they react to small things with old wounds.
That is another thing the bishop teaches:
what moves diagonally can travel far.
A secret in one generation becomes anxiety in the next.
A silence in one house becomes distance in another.
A wound nobody named becomes a rule everybody follows without knowing why.
Do not cry.
Do not ask.
Do not embarrass the family.
Do not speak about what happened.
Do not bring outsiders into our business.
Do not make your mother sad.
Do not make your father angry.
Do not be too soft.
Do not be too honest.
Do not be too free.
Every family has commandments that were never written down.

Some protect.

Some imprison.

The hard part is learning the difference.

I used to think judgment was clarity.

If someone made a mistake, I thought I knew what that meant about them.

If someone stayed in a bad situation, I thought they were weak.

If someone kept forgiving the wrong person, I thought they lacked self-respect.

If someone was angry, distant, loud, cold, or difficult, I thought that was the whole story.

Then life humbled me.

It showed me that people often behave from places we cannot see.

The woman who stays may not be blind.

She may be afraid.

She may have nowhere to go.

She may have children, papers, debt, shame, religion, family pressure, and a heart trained to confuse suffering with loyalty.

The man who never speaks may not be empty.

He may have been punished every time he tried.

He may have learned that feelings were traps.

He may be carrying a grief nobody taught him how to hold.

The child who acts out may not be bad.

He may be speaking in the only language adults finally notice.

The person who seems cold may be tired of being used.

The person who seems proud may be terrified of being seen as nothing.

The person who laughs too much may be trying not to collapse.

Seeing diagonally does not mean excusing everything.

It means refusing to be lazy with another person's humanity.

There is a difference between understanding and allowing harm to continue.

Understanding asks, "Where did this come from?"

Allowing says, "You can keep hurting me because I understand you."

Those are not the same thing.

Maturity is learning to see the wound without volunteering to become its next victim.

That took me time.

Because when you come from places where everybody is carrying something, empathy can become dangerous if it has no boundaries.

You start explaining everybody.

Defending everybody.

Rescuing everybody.

Staying too long because you know why they are broken.

But knowing why someone bleeds does not mean you must stand there and let them bleed on you forever.

The bishop sees.

But the bishop still moves.

That is important.

Seeing pain clearly does not require living inside it.

Faith, at its best, should help people tell the truth.

Not hide from it.

It should make us more honest, more humble, more responsible, more willing to repair what we broke.

It should not be a curtain.

It should be a light.

Not the kind of light that humiliates people.

The kind that finally lets a room breathe.

I think about the old women who prayed for everybody and still knew everything.

They saw the diagonal.

They saw who was drinking too much.

Who was lonely.

Who was pretending.

Who needed food.

Who needed a warning.

Who needed to be left alone.

Who needed someone to knock on the door and say, "I made too much. Take this."

There was wisdom there.

Not perfect wisdom.

Human wisdom.

The kind that came from surviving, watching, losing, forgiving, and sometimes staying quiet longer than they should have.

I respect that kind of seeing.

But I also know the next generation needs more than seeing.

We need language.

We need to name what happened.

We need to say depression without shame.

Anxiety without mockery.

Abuse without excuses.

Loneliness without pride.

Love without control.

Family without pretending family never wounds.

Faith without using faith to silence the wounded.

The bishop moves on one color for the whole game.

That is its limit.

It can see far, but not everywhere.

Maybe that is a warning too.

All of us have angles we understand and squares we cannot reach.
No one sees the whole board alone.
That is why we need each other.
Not just people who agree with us.
People who can see what our pain makes invisible.
People who can tell us when our faith has become fear.
When our loyalty has become self-abandonment.
When our silence has become a family tradition.
When our judgment has become a way to avoid compassion.
When our compassion has become a way to avoid boundaries.
The bishop taught me that truth often arrives from an angle.
Not as a shout.
Not as a sermon.
Sometimes as a memory.
A sentence someone says without knowing it opens a door.
A child asking a question nobody wanted to answer.
A quiet moment after an argument when you finally hear yourself.
A prayer that stops asking God to change everybody else and starts asking for the courage to be honest.
The diagonal is not the easy path.
But sometimes it is the only way to see what has been hiding in plain sight.
And once you see it, you have a choice.

You can protect the silence.

Or you can protect the truth.

For a long time, many of us thought those were the same thing.

They are not.

Silence keeps the board looking clean.

Truth lets the game change.

The Rook - The Ones Who Hold the Line

The rook moves in straight lines.

Forward.

Back.

Side to side.

No tricks.

No bending.

No mystery.

It holds files and ranks. It guards space. It stands at the edge of the board like a wall with a purpose.

Maybe that is why the rook reminds me of people who spend their lives holding the line.

Every family has them.

The one everybody calls when something breaks.

The one who keeps working after everyone else goes to sleep.

The one who does not cry because if they cry, the whole house might understand how serious it is.

The one who knows the rent date, the doctor's appointment, the school meeting, the court papers, the medicine schedule, the cousin who needs help, the bill that cannot wait, the lie the family is telling itself to keep breathing.

They stand.
That is what people see.
They stand so long that standing becomes their identity.
On the block, there were many rooks.
Men who fixed cars in the cold because somebody had to get to work in the morning.
Mothers who turned kitchens into command centers.
Older brothers who became fathers before they understood their own anger.
Aunties who knew everyone's business because everyone eventually needed them.
Friends who answered calls at midnight and never told anyone they were tired of being emergency exits for other people's lives.
The rook is respected.
But respect can be a lonely kind of love.
People admire the strong one.
They rely on the strong one.
They praise the strong one.
Then they forget the strong one is still human.
That is the danger.

When people get used to your strength, they stop checking for your pain.

They assume you can take it.

They assume you will manage.

They assume you do not need the tenderness everybody else receives without asking.

And sometimes, because you are tired of explaining, you start believing them.

You become the wall.

You become the answer.

You become the person who says, "I got it," even when you do not.

At first, it feels like responsibility.

Then it becomes habit.

Then it becomes prison.

I have seen people trapped inside their own usefulness.

They did not know who they were if nobody needed them.

They did not know how to rest without feeling guilty.

They did not know how to receive without apologizing.

They did not know how to say, "I can't," because their whole life had trained them to believe love meant being available beyond their limits.

That is not love.

That is exhaustion with a good reputation.

The rook teaches protection.

But protection can become control when fear is driving it.

Some people hold the line because they love you.

Some hold it because they are terrified of what will happen if they do not.

Some protect the family so hard that nobody inside it can breathe.

Some call it discipline when it is really anxiety.

Some call it leadership when it is really the fear of being helpless.

Some call it strength when it is really refusal to be vulnerable.

This is where the rook becomes complicated.

Because the people who protect us can also hurt us with the shape of their protection.

A father may work himself into silence and think he has given his children everything because the lights stayed on.

But children need more than electricity.

They need words.

They need softness.

They need to know the person paying the bills also knows how to ask about their heart.

A mother may sacrifice everything and then feel wounded when her children grow and want lives of their own.

But love that gives everything can still become heavy if it keeps a receipt.

An older sibling may protect the younger ones so fiercely that they never learn how to be young themselves.

Then later, when nobody needs saving, they do not know what to do with their hands.

The rook stands.

But nobody can stand forever without something inside them going numb.

In many hard places, people confuse numbness with strength.

The man who never reacts is strong.

The woman who never complains is strong.

The friend who always shows up is strong.

The worker who takes every extra shift is strong.

The child who does not ask for anything is mature.

But sometimes what we call strength is just someone who learned early that need was inconvenient.

That realization changed how I see people.

Especially the ones who seem unbreakable.

Now, when someone says, "I'm good," too quickly, I listen differently.

When someone changes the subject after a hard question, I notice.

When someone is always busy, always fixing, always helping, always carrying, I wonder what would happen if they stopped.

Not because I want them to fail.

Because I wonder whether they know they are allowed to be more than useful.

The rook's loyalty is beautiful.

There is honor in standing by people, in being dependable, in protecting what matters.

The world would collapse without people who hold the line.

But there is also a quiet tragedy in being needed more than you are known.

Some people know your strength but not your story.

They know what you can do but not what it costs.

They know how to call you but not how to care for you.

They know you will answer.

So they never ask if you want to.

That is how resentment grows in good people.

Not because they do not love.

Because they have loved without rest for too long.

Resentment is often grief that never got permission to speak.

It says:

I wanted help too.

I wanted someone to notice.

I wanted to be held without having to fall apart first.

I wanted to matter when I was not solving anything.

There are rooks in every neighborhood walking around with that sentence inside them.

You can see it in their shoulders.

In the way they sigh before saying yes.

In the way they make jokes about being tired because saying it seriously would make people uncomfortable.

In the way they sit in parked cars for a few extra minutes before going inside, because the car is the only room where nobody needs them yet.

I understand that silence.

A parked car can become a chapel for tired people.

Engine off.

Phone face down.

One hand on the steering wheel.

Breathing before returning to the role.

There are moments like that all over the world.

Private pauses.

Invisible collapses.

People gathering themselves in bathrooms, stairwells, break rooms, buses, laundry rooms, hospital corridors.

Then they stand up.

They fix their face.

They go back.

The rook goes back.

But what if strength did not require disappearance?

What if the ones who hold the line were allowed to be held too?

What if being reliable did not mean being endlessly available?

What if love sounded less like, "I need you," and more like, "How are you really?"

Some people will not know how to answer that question.

Ask anyway.

Ask again later.

Ask without making their pain a performance.

Ask in a way that gives them somewhere safe to put the truth.

Because strong people are often surrounded by people who admire them but do not know how to reach them.

And sometimes, they do not know how to be reached.

They have spent too long being the wall.

They do not know how to become a door.

The rook also teaches boundaries.

A wall without a gate becomes a prison.

A protector without limits becomes resentful.

A helper without rest becomes bitter.

A loyal person without self-respect becomes easy to use.

Boundaries do not make love smaller.

They make love honest.

They say:

I can care about you without abandoning myself.

I can show up without destroying my own life.

I can love my family without carrying every consequence for them.

I can be strong and still need support.

I can stand with you without standing in the fire for you every time.

That is not selfish. That is survival with wisdom.

The rook is powerful because it holds lines.

But a human being is not a chess piece.

A person cannot live forever as a structure for everyone else.

Even walls crack.

Even towers lean.

Even the dependable ones have nights when they do not know who to call.

So if you are the rook in your family, hear this:

you are allowed to sit down.

You are allowed to say no without writing a full essay in your defense.

You are allowed to disappoint people who only loved your availability.

You are allowed to be tired before you break.

You are allowed to need the same care you have spent years giving away.

And if you love a rook, do not wait for collapse to prove they needed you.

Notice them while they are still standing.

Ask what the strength costs.

Offer help before they have to beg.

Respect their limits without making them feel guilty for having them.

Love them as a person, not only as a shelter.

The rook taught me that holding the line is noble.

But healing begins when the line no longer has to be held alone.

The Queen - The Invisible Power

The queen moves in every direction.

Forward.

Back.

Sideways.

Diagonally.

Across distance.

Through danger.

With a freedom no other piece has.

For a long time, I thought that meant power.

Now I think it also means exhaustion.

Because some people look unlimited only because nobody ever allowed them to stop.

On the block, the queens did not wear crowns.

They wore work shoes.

Scrubs.

Aprons.

House dresses.

Hair tied up in a hurry.

Keys between their fingers walking home at night.

Grocery bags cutting into their hands.

A phone pressed between shoulder and ear while they cooked, listened, worried,
and answered a question from another room.

They were mothers, grandmothers, aunties, sisters, neighbors.

Women who knew who had eaten.

Who was sick.

Who needed a ride.

Who was lying when they said they were fine.

Who had court in the morning.

Who was short on rent.

Who was acting tough because something had broken inside.

They moved in every direction because life demanded it.

To the kitchen.

To work.

To school meetings.

To hospitals.

To county offices.

To church.

To the corner store.

To someone else's house because someone else's child had not come home yet.

The queen was everywhere.

And because she was everywhere, people forgot she had a body.

Forgot she had dreams.

Forgot she had pain that did not belong to anyone else.

Forgot she had a name before she became "Mom," "Ma," "Auntie," "Grandma," "Miss,"
"Baby, can you help me?"

That is one of the cruelest things love can do when it becomes lazy:
it turns a person into a function.

The one who cooks.

The one who remembers.

The one who forgives.

The one who answers.

The one who prays.

The one who knows where everything is.

The one who keeps the family from becoming strangers.

And because she does it so well, nobody asks what it costs.

I grew up surrounded by that kind of power.

But back then, I did not call it power.

I called it normal.

Normal was seeing a tired mother continue.

Normal was watching a grandmother save the best piece for everybody else.

Normal was a woman swallowing worry so the house would not lose its floor.

Normal was clean clothes appearing, food appearing, birthdays remembered, appointments handled, arguments softened, secrets carried,

children protected, men forgiven, and nobody stopping long enough to ask:

Who protects her?

It is strange how long it can take to recognize what has been saving you.

In chess, losing the queen changes the whole game.

In life too.

There are absences that do not take up space.

They take over space.

An empty chair.

A voice that no longer calls from the kitchen.

A smell that appears in the hallway and breaks you for no reason.

A recipe nobody can make the same way.

A birthday that still arrives even though the person does not.

When a queen is gone, the house becomes confused.

People do not know where things are.

They do not know who to call.

They do not know how to calm each other.

They do not know how much of the family was being held together by someone they had mistaken for ordinary.

Grief reveals architecture.

It shows you who was carrying the beams.

And many families only understand the queen's labor when her hands are no longer there to do it.

That is a painful education.

I learned that love can be strategy.

Not the cold kind.

Not the kind that moves people like objects.

The kind that keeps people alive.

A plate saved.

A call made.

A coat pushed into your hands because the night is colder than your pride.

A quiet lie told to keep children from worrying too soon.

A prayer whispered over someone who would never admit they needed it.

A ride offered before the person had to ask.

A look across the room that says, "I know. We will talk later."

That is strategy too.

The strategy of care.

The strategy of noticing.

The strategy of keeping a family human in a world that keeps trying to make people hard.

But care can become a cage.
That is the truth we do not always want to say.
Many queens were loved and used at the same time.
Depended on and overlooked.
Praised and abandoned.
Called strong while being denied help.
Given flowers after death but not rest while alive.
There is a special kind of sadness in watching a woman become a miracle for everyone except herself.
She knows everyone's hunger but ignores her own.
She remembers everyone's appointment but delays her own checkup.
She teaches everybody how to love each other but forgets to ask if she is being loved well.
She becomes so necessary that her own desires start to feel like interruptions.
And we, the people loved by queens, have to tell the truth:
we got used to the miracle.
We got used to the table being set.
The laundry being folded.
The birthday call.
The right question at the right time.

The strength always available.

We got used to being seen by someone we did not always see back.

That is why gratitude is not enough.

Gratitude can still be passive.

You can be grateful and still let someone drown in responsibility.

You can say "thank you" and still never ask what they need.

You can praise a woman for being strong and still participate in the system that exhausts her.

Love has to become more active than appreciation.

It has to ask:

What do you want?

What did you lose while caring for us?

What did you dream before everybody needed you?

Where does it hurt when nobody is watching?

Who were you before survival gave you a schedule?

Those questions may arrive late.

Ask them anyway.

Late love is not perfect, but it can still become honest.

The queen also teaches us about grief.

Not only the grief of death.

The grief of women who are alive but unseen.

Women sitting in living rooms full of people and still feeling alone.

Women whose children love them but do not know them.

Women whose partners depend on them but do not truly meet them.

Women whose families call them blessed because they endured what they should have been protected from.

That is not blessing.

That is burden with religious language.

We have to be careful how we praise suffering.

Some women were not strong because life made them naturally powerful.

They were strong because weakness was not safe.

Because bills did not care about heartbreak.

Because children still needed breakfast.

Because men left, or stayed badly, or did not know how to help.

Because the world applauded their endurance more than it offered their freedom.

I honor those women.

But I do not want to romanticize what hurt them.

There is a difference.

To honor is to see clearly.

To romanticize is to make pain look beautiful so nobody has to change.

The next generation has to be braver than that.

We can love the queens who raised us and still admit they deserved more.

More rest.

More tenderness.

More help.

More room to be angry.

More room to be soft.

More room to be women, not only mothers.

Not only wives.

Not only grandmothers.

Not only caregivers.

Not only the person who solves things.

Person.

That word matters.

Before any title, a queen is a person.

With fear.

With memory.

With desire.

With disappointments.

With a body that gets tired.

With dreams that may have been folded and placed somewhere for later.

A later that maybe never came.

I think of all the women who made love look practical.

Not loud.

Not dramatic.

Practical.

Food.

Warmth.

Clean sheets.

Bus money.

Medicine.

Advice.

Warnings.

Second chances.

Someone waiting up.

Someone pretending not to wait up.

Someone saying, "Text me when you get there," as if that sentence could guard you from the whole world.

Maybe this is what moved me most about them:
their love had hands.

It did things.

It carried bags.

It opened doors.

It counted coins.

It braided hair.

It wiped tables.

It signed forms.

It touched foreheads.

It turned ordinary objects into protection.

But a queen should not have to disappear inside what she gives.

The board depends on her, yes.

But she is not valuable only because she is useful.

She is valuable because she is.

Even still.

Even resting.

Even saying no.

Even choosing herself.

Even placing the crown down for a while, especially when the crown is invisible and nobody knows how much it weighs.

So if you still have a queen in your life, do not wait.

Ask the questions.

Learn the recipes.

Record the stories.

Notice the hands.

Say the thing while she can hear it.

Help before help becomes grief.

And if you are the queen, hear this:

you are allowed to be loved without being useful first.

You are allowed to rest without earning it through collapse.

You are allowed to want something that belongs only to you.

You are allowed to stop saving people who never learned to stop using you.

You are allowed to be more than strong.

The queen moves in every direction.

But maybe her deepest movement is inward.

Back to herself.

Back to the woman beneath the title.

Back to the name she had before everybody needed her.

Back to the life that is still waiting for her, somewhere under all that survival.

The queen taught me that invisible power is still power.

But love should never require a person to become invisible.

The King - The Weight of Command

Everybody thinks the king is in charge.

That was one of the first lies I learned without anyone having to teach it to me.

In chess, the king is the most important piece.

But he is also the most limited.

He moves one square at a time.

He depends on everyone around him.

He lives surrounded by protection and threat.

If he falls, the game ends.

That is not freedom.

That is pressure with a crown on it.

Maybe that is why I think about men when I think about the king.

Not men as rulers.

Men as human beings trapped inside the performance of being in control.

Where I came from, many boys learned early that fear had to be hidden.

Pain had to be swallowed.

Tenderness had to be rationed.

Apologies had to be avoided because saying "I was wrong" felt too close to saying "I am weak."

Nobody had to say these rules out loud.

But the rules were everywhere.

In the way older boys laughed when someone cried.

In the way fathers went quiet instead of explaining.

In the way men turned worry into anger because anger was the only emotion that still looked masculine.

In the way a boy could be hurt and still hear, "Man up," before anyone asked what happened.

That phrase has ruined a lot of men.

Man up.

As if becoming a man means becoming less human.

As if the goal is to feel nothing, need no one, fear nothing, explain nothing, and carry everything without changing your face.

I have seen what that does.

Men who looked big from the outside.

Big voice.

Big pride.

Big presence.

Men who could fill a room and still not know how to sit alone with themselves.

Men who could command respect but could not receive love.

Men who could protect a family but could not speak gently inside one.

Men who would fight a stranger in the street before they would tell their child,

"I am scared too."

At night, when the house was quiet, many of them were not powerful.

They were afraid with responsibilities.

Afraid of failing.

Afraid of not providing.

Afraid of losing respect.

Afraid of being seen as small.

Afraid that if they stopped acting hard, everyone would discover how much of them was still a boy waiting for someone to say, "You do not have to carry this alone."

But nobody said it.

Or if they did, he did not know how to hear it.

That is the tragedy.

Some men are offered love and experience it as threat.

They do not trust tenderness.

They test it.

They push it away.

They make it prove itself.

They call it weakness.

They call it drama.

They call it too much.

But often, what they really mean is:

I do not know what to do with this.

Nobody taught me how to be held.

Command becomes dangerous when it is built on fear.

A fearful king controls.

He watches.

He reacts.

He punishes questions.

He confuses disagreement with disrespect.

He hears honesty as attack.

He wants peace but only if peace means nobody challenges him.

That is not command.

That is insecurity with authority.

And families suffer under that.

Children learn to read footsteps.

Women learn to soften truth before saying it.

Friends learn which jokes are safe.

Rooms learn to shrink.

Everybody adjusts around the king's fear and calls it respect because fear has better manners when it lives in a house for long enough.

We have to tell the truth:

some men hurt people because they refused to face themselves.

Their pain was real.

Their damage was also real.

One does not cancel the other.

Understanding a man's wounds does not excuse the wounds he gives away.

A hard childhood is not permission to become a hard place for everyone else.

A father who suffered still has to learn how not to make his children pay for what he never healed.

A man who was abandoned still has to learn how not to abandon people emotionally while sitting in the same room.

A man who was disrespected still has to learn that love is not an enemy trying to take his throne.

That is maturity.

Not pretending nothing hurt.

Not blaming everything on the past.

But standing in the middle and saying:

This happened to me.

And now I am responsible for what happens through me.

The king's work is not to control the board.

The king's work is to become conscious of his effect on it.

That is a different kind of power.

Quieter.

Less impressive from a distance.

But more honest.

It is the power to pause before reacting.

To apologize without performing shame.

To ask for help before pride turns pain into damage.

To say, "I don't know," without feeling destroyed.

To listen when someone says, "You hurt me," without immediately building a defense.

To provide without thinking money is a substitute for presence.

To protect without controlling.

To love without possession.

To lead without making everyone else smaller.

That is command.

Not volume.

Not intimidation.

Not always having the last word.

Not being feared.

Command is self-government.

It is knowing what is happening inside you before it becomes weather for everyone around you.

Many men were never taught that.

They were taught work.

They were taught endurance.

They were taught suspicion.

They were taught to keep their head up, keep their voice firm, keep their business private, keep going.

Some of that helped them survive.

But survival tools can become relationship weapons.

The same silence that helped a boy endure a dangerous home can make him an emotionally absent husband.

The same toughness that protected him in the street can make his children afraid to be soft around him.

The same independence that kept him alive can make love feel like a cage.

This is why healing matters.

Not because it sounds nice.

Because unhealed men build homes where everybody has to recover from them.

And healed men can change bloodlines.

A healed man apologizes.

A healed man learns his own patterns.

A healed man does not make his family earn gentleness by obeying.

A healed man can be strong without being cruel.

A healed man can be respected without being feared.

A healed man can say to a child, "I was wrong," and not lose authority.

He gains it.

Because children do not need perfect kings.

They need honest ones.

They need men who can show them that responsibility is not the same as emotional prison.

They need men who can work hard and still hug properly.

Men who can be tired and still be kind.

Men who can be disappointed without becoming dangerous.

Men who can teach discipline without humiliation.

Men who know that a home is not peaceful just because nobody is arguing.

Sometimes silence is not peace.

Sometimes it is everyone holding their breath.

The king must learn the difference.

There were men I judged when I was younger.

Some of that judgment was fair.

Some of it was incomplete.

I saw the anger but not always the fear under it.

I saw the distance but not always the grief that built it.

I saw the pride but not always the shame it was protecting.

Growing older did not make me excuse everything.

It made me see more.

And seeing more made me sadder, but also more responsible.

Because if I can see the pattern, I cannot pretend I do not have a choice.

That is the burden of awareness.

Once you know better, survival alone is no longer enough.

You have to decide what kind of man your pain is allowed to create.

Will it create a wall?

A weapon?

A ghost?

A judge?

A boy in a grown body demanding the world repair what it did not break?

Or will it create someone who can feel deeply without making feeling dangerous for others?

That question is not easy.

But it is necessary.

Every king has to face it eventually.

Because the crown is heavy.

Heavier than it looks.

Power is heavy.

Expectation is heavy.

Being needed is heavy.

Being watched is heavy.

Trying not to fail people while never admitting you are afraid is heavy.

But hiding the weight only makes it heavier.

There is no dignity in slowly disappearing behind a role.

There is no honor in being called strong by people who cannot feel safe with you.

There is no victory in controlling a house and losing the hearts inside it.

The king is important, yes.

But importance is not the same as command.

Real command begins when a man stops asking, "How do I make them respect me?"

And starts asking:

Am I safe to love?

Am I honest with myself?

Do the people closest to me feel free to tell me the truth?

Do I protect, or do I possess?

Do I lead, or do I need everyone to orbit my fear?

Do I know how to be present without performing strength?

Those questions can humble a man.

Good.

Some humility is medicine.

The king taught me that the most powerful person on the board can also be the most trapped.

And maybe growing up is learning that command is not making the world move around your pain.

Command is learning to move through pain without becoming a danger to the people who love you.

Checkmate - The End of the Illusion

There are moments when life corners you.

It does not ask if you are ready.

It does not wait for you to understand.

It does not give you time to organize your heart before changing the whole board.

It happens.

A phone call after midnight.

A door closing for the last time.

A name that stops appearing on your screen.

A diagnosis.

A court date.

A job gone.

A chair at the table that stays empty.

A truth you cannot unknow.

And suddenly, everything that looked solid begins to shake.

In chess, check is a warning.

There is still time.

Still a move.

Still a square.

Still a way out if you can see clearly enough.
But life does not always warn us early.
Sometimes the warning was there for years and we called it normal.
The distance.
The drinking.
The silence.
The money problems.
The pain in the body.
The child acting differently.
The love that felt more like management than tenderness.
The anger that kept returning.
The tiredness that sleep could not fix.
We saw it.
But seeing is not the same as facing.
So we kept moving.
Kept working.
Kept laughing at the right times.
Kept answering messages.
Kept posting pictures where everyone looked alive.
Kept saying, "It's fine," because sometimes a lie is easier to carry than the changes truth would demand.
That is how checkmate often begins.

Not with one dramatic event.

With small avoidances.

A conversation postponed.

An apology swallowed.

A boundary ignored.

A bill unopened.

A warning sign explained away.

A pain normalized because everyone around you had pain too.

Then one day you look at your life and do not recognize the room you are standing in.

You do not recognize the relationship.

You do not recognize your own voice.

You do not recognize the face in the mirror.

And the question arrives:

How did I get here?

I have asked that question.

More than once.

It is a quiet question, but it can break a person open.

Because when you ask it honestly, you cannot blame everything on one move.

You begin to see the pattern.

The things you allowed because you were afraid of being alone.

The things you did because pride felt safer than vulnerability.

The people you chased because their distance felt familiar.

The rooms you stayed in because leaving felt like admitting defeat.

The version of yourself you kept performing because you did not know who you would be without it.

Checkmate is painful because it removes fantasy.

The fantasy that they will change without consequence.

The fantasy that you can keep betraying yourself and still feel whole.

The fantasy that time alone heals what honesty refuses to touch.

The fantasy that being needed is the same as being loved.

The fantasy that control is peace.

When the fantasy falls, the first thing you feel is not freedom.

It is emptiness.

That is why so many people run back to what was hurting them.

Pain can feel safer than space when pain is familiar.

At least pain has a routine.

At least chaos has a sound you recognize.

At least the old wound knows your name.

Space is different.

Space asks questions.

What now?

Who are you without this?

What do you actually want?

What were you avoiding?

What did this cost?

Who did you become trying to survive it?

Those questions can feel cruel at first.

But they are not cruel.

They are clean.

Cruelty keeps you confused.

Truth may hurt, but it begins to separate what happened from who you are.

There are defeats nobody sees.

A person can keep going to work.

Keep raising children.

Keep smiling in photos.

Keep paying rent.

Keep showing up.

And inside, they have lost a whole game.

Nobody notices because the body still moves.

But there are bodies that continue long after the soul has asked for a pause.

On the block, people often called that strength.

Now I call it survival without a witness.

There is dignity in survival.

But survival is not the same as being well.

That distinction matters.

Some families survive for generations and call it healing.

It is not.

Survival means we made it through.

Healing asks what making it through did to us.

Checkmate can be a loss.

But it can also be a revelation.

It can be the moment the lie can no longer hold the house.

The moment pride stops protecting and starts imprisoning.

The moment staying the same costs more than changing.

The moment you finally admit that what you called loyalty was fear, what you called patience was self-abandonment, what you called peace was silence, what you called love was attachment to a wound.

That admission hurts.

But it also opens a door.

Not a beautiful door.

At first, it may look like a room with boxes on the floor and no idea where to put anything.

It may look like sleeping on a couch.

It may look like crying in a parked car.

It may look like blocking a number and then staring at the phone for an hour.

It may look like eating because someone told you to, not because you are hungry.

It may look like going to therapy and not knowing where to begin.

It may look like telling the truth badly because you are new to telling it at all.

Beginnings after checkmate rarely look inspiring.

They look human.

Small.

Messy.

Uncertain.

One drawer cleaned.

One honest sentence.

One night without going back.

One morning where the light comes in and you do not feel better yet, but you notice it anyway.

That counts.

People love stories where the ending explains the pain.

But real life does not always give us that.

Sometimes there is no perfect meaning.

Someone leaves.

Someone dies.

Someone betrays you.

Someone gets sick.

Someone you love becomes someone you cannot reach.

Sometimes the lesson does not make the loss fair.

I do not believe every pain happens for a reason.

Some pain is just pain.

Some damage should not have happened.

Some apologies arrive too late.

Some people never become who you needed them to become.

Some chairs stay empty.

No lesson fills them.

But even when pain does not come with a reason, it can still leave us with a choice.

What will I do with what remains?

That question is not pretty.

It is heavy.

But it gives a person back some agency.

Not control over what happened.

Agency over what becomes of them after.

Checkmate teaches consequences.

Every move counted.

The ones we made.

The ones we avoided.

The ones made against us.

The ones we allowed because we did not know our own worth yet.

The ones we repeated because pain was familiar.

Life does not forget movements.

But life is not only punishment.

Sometimes, after checkmate, there is another board.

Not the same.

Never the same.

But another.

And maybe growing up is accepting that some games end because we were disappearing inside them.

Some endings are not failure.

They are rescue arriving late.

That does not make them easy.

A door can be necessary and still hurt when it closes.

A truth can free you and still leave you shaking.

A goodbye can save your life and still break your heart.

Maturity is learning that two things can be true.

You can miss something and know you cannot return.

You can forgive someone and still keep distance.

You can love your family and still refuse the role they gave you.

You can be grateful for survival and still want more than survival.

You can lose and still become more honest.

When I think of checkmate now, I think less of defeat and more of consequence.

The board finally telling the truth.

No more pretending.

No more clever moves.

No more escaping through pride.

No more calling the cage a home because you decorated it.

The illusion ends.

And yes, that hurts.

But illusion was costing something too.

It was costing presence.

Peace.

Self-respect.

Real love.

Real rest.

The person you might become if you stopped trying to win in a place where you were slowly disappearing.

Checkmate is not always the end of life.

Sometimes it is the end of the lie.

And after the lie ends, there may be silence.

Not peace yet.

Just silence.

But in that silence, if you listen closely, you may hear something you have not heard in years.

Your own breathing.

Your own name.

Your own life asking to be lived differently.

Endgame - Another Board

At the end, the board gets quiet.

The pieces stop moving.

The hand that was calculating everything pulls away.

Only then do you feel the tiredness.

For a long time, I thought winning meant reaching the other side without losing anything.

Now I know life rarely works like that.

Life takes pieces.

It takes certainty.

It takes people.

It takes versions of us we thought would last forever.

It takes plans we built in our heads before we knew how quickly a phone call, a decision, a body, a betrayal, or a goodbye could change the whole room.

And still, somehow, we continue.

Not always because we are brave in the beautiful way people like to describe.

Sometimes we continue because rent is due.

Because a child is calling our name.

Because someone needs a ride.

Because the kitchen light is still on.

Because morning arrives even when the night has not left us inside.

The endgame is not always victory.

It is not always defeat either.

Sometimes it is clarity.

The ability to look back and say:

I did what I could with what I knew.

That sentence does not erase mistakes.

It does not bring back the people we lost.

It does not unsay the words we said when anger moved faster than love.

It does not clean every mark.

But maybe it lets us breathe.

There are games I would play differently now.

People I would apologize to sooner.

Doors I would close with less guilt.

Silences I would break before they became walls.

Warnings I would believe the first time.

Love I would not beg for.

Pain I would not call normal just because it was familiar.

But nobody matures in time to avoid everything.

We learn after.

After the fall.

After the loss.

After the sentence that cannot be taken back.

After the person leaves.

After the room is empty.

After we understand that pride does not warm a house.

If there is any wisdom in this book, it is probably small.

Not the wisdom of someone who won.

The wisdom of someone who watched pawns carry worlds, knights find paths where no path was given, bishops read pain from hidden angles, rooks stand until they forgot they were allowed to sit, queens save lives with ordinary hands, and kings learn too late that command is not control.

And after seeing all that, I cannot look at people as simple pieces anymore.

Everyone carries an invisible game.

A fear.

A promise.

A loss.

A shame.

A childhood room still living inside them.

A name that still hurts when it appears without warning.

A version of themselves they are trying either to become or escape.

That does not mean everyone is safe.

That does not mean everyone deserves access to you.

Understanding people does not require handing them the keys to your peace.

But it does mean judgment should slow down.

Because many movements only make sense when you know the whole board.

And most of the time, we do not.

We see the move.

Not the hunger behind it.

Not the grief.

Not the pressure.

Not the family history.

Not the night before.

Not the old wound speaking through the present moment.

Not the fear wearing anger's clothes.

The endgame teaches humility.

It teaches that winning alone can look like triumph from far away, but sometimes it is just loneliness dressed well.

It teaches that losing does not always destroy us.

Sometimes it removes us from a place where we were becoming someone we did not respect.

It teaches that not every ending is punishment.

Some endings are protection we did not understand yet.

It teaches that peace is not the same as silence.

Love is not the same as need.

Strength is not the same as numbness.

Forgiveness is not the same as access.

Success is not the same as healing.

And command is not the same as control.

That may be the lesson underneath all the others.

When I was younger, I thought command meant having power over the board.

Knowing every move.

Protecting every piece.

Never being surprised.

Never being hurt.

Never being exposed.

Never being the one who needed help.

But life has a way of humbling that fantasy.

You can do everything carefully and still lose someone.

You can love deeply and still be misunderstood.

You can work hard and still be tired.

You can plan well and still be interrupted.

You can be good and still suffer.

Control is too small to carry a human life.

Consciousness is better.

That is what command means to me now.
Not controlling everything.
Being awake inside what is happening.
Knowing when anger is asking to drive.
Knowing when pride is trying to protect shame.
Knowing when silence is no longer peace.
Knowing when love has become fear of being alone.
Knowing when loyalty has turned into self-abandonment.
Knowing when leaving is not betrayal.
Knowing when staying is not courage.
Knowing when the person you are trying to save is also the person slowly destroying you.
Knowing when you are becoming the thing you once promised yourself you would never be.
That kind of knowing is not comfortable.
But it is freedom.
Quiet freedom.
The kind that does not need to announce itself.
The kind that changes how you answer a message.
How you speak to a child.
How you apologize.
How you choose a room.

How you leave one.

How you hold love without closing your fist around it.

The kind that lets you protect without possessing.

Stay without disappearing.

Leave without destroying.

Rest without guilt.

Win without humiliating.

Lose without becoming bitter.

That is another board.

Not easier.

But more honest.

On this board, you do not need to be untouchable.

You do not need to turn every scar into a weapon.

You do not need to prove the past wrong by becoming hard.

You do not need to make people fear you to believe you matter.

You do not need to abandon your tenderness to survive your story.

Maybe that is the real endgame:

to go through what should have made you cruel and still fight to remain human.

Not innocent.

Not naive.

Human.

Clearer.

Wiser.

Less willing to confuse chaos with love.

Less willing to call suffering loyalty.

Less willing to disappear for people who only recognize you when you are useful.

More able to see others.

More able to see yourself.

I do not know if anyone ever masters life.

I do not think mastery is the point.

Chess has rules.

Life has patterns.

Rules are cleaner.

Patterns are harder.

They repeat through families, neighborhoods, relationships, choices, silences,
and the ways we try to protect ourselves from old pain.

Maybe growing up is learning to notice the pattern before it becomes destiny.

Maybe healing is interrupting one move you were taught to repeat.

Maybe love is helping someone see the board without pretending you can play for them. Maybe dignity is moving with care even after life has moved against you.

I still think about the block.

Not as a simple place.

It was never simple.

It held beauty and danger.

Laughter and pressure.

Protection and fear.

People who harmed.

People who saved.

People who did both because human beings are rarely as clean as the stories we tell about them.

The block taught me to read faces.

To notice silence.

To respect survival.

To distrust easy judgment.

To understand that a person can be strong and still need care.

That a mother can be powerful and still exhausted.

That a man can look in control and still be afraid.

That a child can know too much and still need childhood.

That a family can love you and still teach you things you will spend years unlearning.

I carry all of that.

Not as a chain.

As a board I am finally learning to see.

And maybe that is enough for now.

To see.

To choose.

To move with more honesty than before.

To stop calling every old instinct wisdom.

To stop calling every open door danger.

To stop trying to win games that cost too much of my soul.

At the end, nobody leaves the board the same.

Some leave harder.

Some leave quieter.

Some leave bitter.

Some leave awake.

Some finally leave free.

I am still learning how to play.

But I know this:

life taught me chess before I knew the names of the pieces.

And if I try to be in command now, it is not to defeat everybody.

It is to stop abandoning myself.

It is to move with my eyes open.

It is to protect what is human in me.

Even here.

Especially here.

On another board.

Chess in the Block